Work That Matters

A strong economy requires a highly educated work force, according to business leaders.

Public school teachers like Anne Keith are getting the job done.

As an 8th grade math teacher in Bozeman, Anne sets high standards and gives students the confidence to achieve them.

"Students enter math class believing they're either 'good at math' or that they'll never be good at it," she says. "My students all learn that they can and do understand math, and that it can be fun."

Anne shares her methods with teachers across the state, helping thousands of students succeed in math.

That's good news, because math is fundamental for science, engineering, technology, and medicine – all essential to moving Montana forward.

Montana needs Anne Keith and her fellow teachers. They make a difference for our children and our economy. We need to keep them and other public employees doing work that matters for Montana.
