Multiple sclerosis (MS) is considered an autoimmune disease where the body attacks itself resulting in damage to the nervous system. MS can cause paralysis, blindness, cognitive dysfunction, mobility impairment and many other serious symptoms. To find new ways to prevent, slow or repair the devastating effects of MS, the National Multiple Sclerosis Society supports the conduct of scientifically meritorious medical research, including research utilizing human cells, in accordance with federal, state and local laws and with adherence to the strictest ethical and procedural guidelines.
