For the sake of being a self-governing society of concerned citizens, we must overturn the huge impact of money on elections. Montana could, famously, be the first to reject this notion that corporations should have the same rights as natural persons. People would then begin to be able to be heard in the halls of policy-makers. Our representatives would not be afraid of the deluge of corporate 'free speech' or money smearing them in the next campaign, if they vote for their values rather than for their re-election.

This would be the start of restoring a connection between the People and our government. People would become interested in their civic lives again and in making Montana a great place to live and work. It is imperative that people have a sense of involvement with our society and that their vote actually does matter when it comes to election time, or, as they become more and more despondent and uninvolved, we will move inexorably toward plutocracy and extreme economic stratification. Already so many people are disenchanted with the electoral system that our state and country have lower voter turnout than most developed nations and many developing ones.

The anger people feel is righteous after bailing out the banks and then being hit with joblessness and poverty, while the wealthy make record profits and jobs are low priority for the ruling class. The target of their anger has just been misdirected, for government is the one institution that can bring our force in numbers together to protect the powerless from the profit-making relentlessness of the corporate structure. While corporations serve many valuable purposes in society, they are not the People of this nation and their interests are not the same as ours, our state's or our nation's.

Jobs are a great example of the difference between the national interest and the corporate interest. From a corporate standpoint, yes, it makes sense to send jobs to low wage countries, but in the interests of this nation and its people, some regulation and economic disincentives need to be set to keep our country healthy, safe and prepared for the future, both economically and socially.

We, the People, care to be heard, on this and many other matters. Until our voices are once again more important than those of corporations, government is no longer of the People, (or for us) and our democratic republic fails to stand the test of time.

Please vote yes on HJ 10.
