

EXHIBIT 10
DATE 2-18-15
NO HB 377

FYI GOOGLE FOR DETAILED INFORMATION ABOUT SUBVERSIVE CONTENT OF COMMON CORE*

1. Bill Ayers Terrorist of 1960's, "We now have control of the child's mind." Common Core
2. David Coleman (and Marxist mother), Chair of SAT Board author of ELA Common Core
3. Barack Obama association with Ayers, Coleman, others
4. Weingarten AFT
5. Arne Duncan , Sec'y of Ed
6. Alinsky Rules For Radicals

* These names will lead you to more information about the US Government's planned takeover of the States and local authority of the public school curriculum.+`

Skip to comments.

The Truth about Common Core (Bill Ayers)

Selous Foundation ^ | October 16, 2012 | Mary GrabarPosted on 4/6/2013 7:34:15 PM by Texas Fossil

I just heard another Republican politico, a state senator here in Georgia, at a meeting, claim that Common Core is not a federalized education curriculum, but a “state-led” education reform initiative.

He could have been reading from a press release sent by the Obama Department of Education.

In reality, Common Core was attached to millions of dollars in stimulus funds that were dangled by the feds before the states in a contest called “Race to the Top” during the 2009 economic crisis. The attached Common Core standards were not even written when states signed up. Writing the standards and attached tests are education “experts” whose philosophies align with Weatherman/terrorist-turned-education professor Bill Ayers. Ayers’ close colleague, Linda Darling-Hammond, was head of the education transition team during the 2008 campaign. Now she is overseeing the development of national tests.

This initiative was waiting in the wings, already lined up by Hillary Clinton before Bill Clinton even took office (thanks to the largesse of the Gates Foundation and others). The Gates Foundation has poured tens of millions of dollars into education efforts here in Georgia (as they have in other states). But we are simply to believe the talking point that proponents of Common Core have put out about this being an effort to raise and align standards, so children going from state to state can be assured of keeping up with their peers in other states.

I took the opportunity at this meeting to hand out copies of my report for Accuracy in Media, Terrorist Professor Bill Ayers and Obama’s Federal School Curriculum. Many of the people in the room were concerned about education and probably did not know that the misleadingly named Common Core offers disguised opportunities to advance an anti-American agenda through literature, and even math; and it dumbs down standards.

Few people have actually looked at the Common Core compliant curriculum materials being developed and sold. Typical are adaptations of popular adult nonfiction books like Fast Food Nation, the socialist tract, Nickel and Dimed, and books about teen idol Justin Bieber.

More at link

TOPICS: Crime/Corruption; Editorial; Government; News/Current Events

KEYWORDS: ayers; billayers; billgates; cccbillayers; commoncore; commoncorebillayers; education; federalizingschools; gatesfoundation; learning; newscorp; publicschools; socialist; stimulus; teaching

A Socialist Cancer is being injected into our Education system. It has been moving there many years but this is much worse.

1 posted on 4/6/2013 7:34:16 PM by Texas Fossil

[Post Reply | Private Reply | View Replies]

Common Core 'architect' David Coleman's history with Bill Ayers and Barack Obama

November 27, 2013

Like

Share

6.9k

Post to Your Wall

Tweet

394

DANETTE CLARK

Danette Clark is a mom, former paralegal turned business operator, researcher, and writer. She previously contributed to RBO2.com.

) CHICAGO – Referred to as 'Common Core lead standards authors' by the Council of Chief State School Officers (CCSSO), David Coleman and Jason Zimba are just two in a long list of Common Core creators whose academic roots are with the education-for-a-revolution machine borne by Annenberg Institute, Carnegie Corporation, Bill Gates, et al.

Today, Coleman and Zimba are head of Student Achievement Partners, an organization that played a leading role in developing the standards and actively supports districts and states in implementing them.

Prior to Student Achievement Partners, Coleman and Zimba were co-founders of the Grow Network (now owned by McGraw-Hill Company). Grow Network began as a pilot program in New York in 2000. Less than a year later, the

RELATED STORIES

West Virginia legislator: 'We will repeal Common Core'

Erin Tuttle: Common Core reaches into private schools

Chris Christie talks about 'grave concerns' over Common Core

Chicago Public Education Fund began negotiating a contract with Grow Network on behalf of Chicago Public Schools.

The Chicago Public Education Fund ('The Fund') was created in 1998 by the Chicago Annenberg Challenge (CAC) board of directors, which included Barack Obama as board chairman and communist Bill Ayers, as co-chair.

President Obama's recently appointed Commerce Secretary, Penny Pritzker, was one of twelve founding board members appointed to The Fund.

Obama himself worked with The Fund for the next several years as a leadership council member, alongside Bill Ayers' father, Thomas Ayers, and brother, John Ayers.

From Catalyst Chicago, March 2000:

"The Chicago Annenberg Challenge will close up shop in June 2001, but its efforts to improve public education will live on through a new community foundation...the Chicago Public Education Fund..."

The Fund existed and still exists to carry on the work of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge — that work being the expansion of Theodore Sizer's Coalition of Essential Schools, the reform movement that now (even absent Common Core) indoctrinates students in several states and districts nationwide with a Marxist-Communist political, moral and social ideology.

In 2001, shortly after Arne Duncan began his stint as CEO of Chicago Public Schools (CPS), David Coleman's newly formed Grow Network solidified its $2.2 million contract with CPS to provide the district with data driven student performance reports for the 2002-2003 school year.

In CPS's 2002 Education Plan, which introduced Grow Network as a new initiative, President Obama is listed as a member of the district's planning and development advisory committee. The report also names John Ayers and Communist-Maoist Mike Klonsky of Bill Ayers' Small Schools Workshop as participants in CPS's education plan discussion groups.

In 2004, Coleman and Zimba sold Grow Network to McGraw Hill, which continues its lucrative partnership with CPS today. In fact, two former Grow Network members now work for the Chicago Public Education Fund — one of them as its managing director.

The fact that Grow Network has history with the Ayers/Obama/Annenberg led Chicago school system, and was recruited by the Ayers/Obama/Annenberg created Chicago Public Education Fund, doesn't necessarily implicate David Coleman and Jason Zimba as supporters of Chicago's radically progressive style of education. However, given Coleman's progressive upbringing and the fact that CPS paid more than $2 million to bring his untested and unproven program to the district, it does seem likely that Coleman and Zimba had prior connections to the Chicago ed machine.

Fast forward to today and we see each of these players still working to expand the Annenberg/Coalition of Essential Schools (CES) reform model, a model whose teaching strategies, lesson plans, and curriculum resources are identical to those now being used with Common Core.

Communist, domestic terrorist, and creator of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge, Bill Ayers, continues to speak on behalf of the Annenberg/CES reform effort and provides professional development to teachers and principals from CES schools and districts.

From the White House, Obama and Duncan promote, by name, Bill Ayers' Small Schools Workshop and the Coalition of Essential Schools while funneling billions to states that have adopted Common Core.

Carnegie Corporation, which has continued to support Annenberg/CES reform over the years, now also provides heavy funding to the Council of Chief State School Officers for the creation and implementation of Common Core.

Authored by Danette Clark

Home » Special Report » Terrorist Professor Bill Ayers and Obama's Federal School Curriculum

About the author

Terrorist Professor Bill Ayers and Obama's Federal School Curriculum

Mary Grabar — September 21, 2012

118 Comments | Printer Friendly

Three years after the Department of Education announced a contest called Race-to-the-Top for $4.35 billion in stimulus funds, some parents, teachers, governors, and citizen and public policy groups are coming to an awful realization about the likely outcomes:

- A national curriculum called Common Core
- Regionalism, or the replacement of local governments by federally appointed bureaucrats
- A leveling of all schools to one, low national standard, and a redistribution of education funds among school districts
- An effective federal tracking of all students

1,109

Tweet

30

84

...the course of ...
...through ...

Like

Machine behind the scenes, implementing their policies and ... standards are associates from President Obama's community zine days. In de facto control of the education component is Linda Darling-Hammond, a radical left-wing educator and close

Enchanted "Bill" Ayers, the former leader of the communist ue of William "Bill" Ayers, the former leader of the communist During the Bush election my daughter was attending college. She had a little sign that she brought to a class not sure st Weather Underground, who became a professor of education what the subject was, how ever when she held it up, her professor said, Morgan I thought you were a better person than and ...

When these dangerous initiatives are implemented, there will be no reserves left. She has gone on to be very successful in schools and ...
schooling, or by throwing your children in private schools.

How was it that 48 governors entered Race-to-the-Top without knowing outcome Patrick Ray

That's the first time I have seen "conservative" and "think for yourself" used to describe the same thing. Of course, It was one of the many crises exploited by the Obama administration. While the public was focused on a series of radical moves coming in rapid-fire succession, like the health care bill and proposed trials and imprisonment of 9/11 terrorists on domestic soil. Many politicians and pundits praised Obama on this singular issue, repeating the official rhetoric about raising standards.

It stands to reason that the education policies would be consistent with Obama's agenda. After all, one of his most controversial associations, highlighted during the 2008 presidential campaign, was with an education professor, Bill
Ayers. As a terror gardenz
Prairie Fire Manifesto to Sirhan Sirhan, the convicted assassin of Robert F.
Kennedy. It was for this reason that Kennedy's son, Christopher Kennedy, chairman of the University of Illinois board of trustees, voted against bestowing isot emeritus" status on Ayers after he retired. "I intend to vote against ring the honorific title of our university whose body of work includes a book dedicated in part to the man who murdered my father, Robert F. Kennedy," he said. student progress as a group, but no individual test results are to be distributed to students.

THE OBAMA DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION WOULD BE ...
Back then the former leader ...
University of Illinois at Chicago. The two had worked together closely from the Chicago Annenberg Challenge, the brainchild of Bill Ayers, they funneled more that $100 million to radical groups like ACORN and Gamaliel, which used the funds to promote radical education. [i] This initiative was also promoted by Arne Duncan, now Secretary of Education. Also as board members of the Woods Fund
Ayers and Obama channeled money to ACORN and the Midwest Academy. [ii]

When initial white house visitor logs were released in 2009, the administration quickly dismissed speculations about visits by "William Ayers." That was a different William Ayers Americans were told. The Obama administration is appealing an August 17 order to release the other visitor logs in response to a lawsuit filed by Judicial Watch and others.[\[iii\]](#)

It appears, however, that "the" Obama-friendly Bill Ayers has been visiting Washington, D.C. for education-related matters.

In October 2009, the year before he retired, Ayers had an encounter with the "Backyard Conservative" blogger at Reagan National Airport. At that time, there was speculation about Ayers being the real author of Obama's autobiography, Dreams from My Father. Ayers teased that he was indeed the real author.

Blogger and law professor, Stephen Diamond, noted that no one asked why Ayers would even be in Washington, D.C. It turns out that Ayers was one of three keynote speakers at a conference sponsored by the Renaissance Group, which, according to Diamond, was dedicated to problems of poverty, diversity, and multiculturalism—and the inability of white teachers to deal with them. The other two speakers were Secretary of Education Duncan and U.S. Under Secretary of Education, Martha Kanter.

It is not clear what Ayers spoke about at this particular conference. But my analysis of his courses and methods at the University of Illinois determined that his purpose is to radicalize future teachers—and by extension their students—for the purpose of sparking a revolution and overthrowing capitalism.

It is shocking that Obama Education Department officials would appear at a conference that also featured someone like Ayers. On the other hand, their boss, President Obama, worked with Ayers in Chicago, and this kind of collaboration is not entirely surprising. We are left, however, wondering about the precise nature of the role that Ayers is playing in the development of this federal education plan. But his participation in this conference clearly suggests he is playing a role of some kind.

At this three-day conference, Mr. Nevin Brown of Achieve, Inc., made a presentation on the "Common Core State Standards" Initiative. A recipient of the largesse of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, Achieve would become a key player in revamping education under Common Core. Hence, Ayers was a major speaker at a conference that was involved in developing a new national curriculum. If Achieve has ever disavowed Ayers or his teaching methods, we could find no evidence of this on the public record.

The notion of a "Common Core" seems to recall E.D. Hirsch's traditionalist Common Knowledge curriculum, which emphasizes the need for students to understand America's cultural and national heritage. But Common Core is not that at all. Many have been fooled, and an estimated 80% of the public does not even know about Common Core.

Common Core is part of an effort to implement regionalism, the replacement of local governments by regional boards of federally appointed bureaucrats, who in turn are beholden to international bodies. Regionalism will eliminate the freedom parents now have in choosing neighborhoods with good schools because tax funds will be distributed equally. There will be no escape in home schooling or private schools either, because the curriculum will follow national tests. Students will be tracked through mandatory state records that will then be accessible to Washington bureaucrats. Ultimately, all students will be subject to education mandates implemented by Obama's radical cronies.

NOT LETTING A CRISIS GO TO WASTE

"Race to the Top" required that states commit to yet-to-be-written Common Core standards in math and English/Language Arts (ELA). Today, Common Core has the support of Randi Weingarten, president of the American Federation of Teachers, and was included in the platform of the Democratic National Convention. It was embraced by former Republican Florida Governor, Jeb Bush, much to the consternation of Tea Party groups, who see this as an unconstitutional federal takeover of education. The Republican Party is divided.

Emmett McGroarty and Jane Robbins, in their white paper "Controlling Education from the Top: Why Common Core Is Bad for America," describe the pressure and sleight-of-hand that led governors to sign onto a commitment that was then changed before the ink had fully dried. They reveal that rather than being a state-led reform initiative, as touted, the new standards were written by a few well-connected, but non-qualified, education entrepreneurs. The history goes back decades, but in the most recent phase, the vision for Common Core was set in 2007, by the Washington-based contractor, Achieve, Inc., in a document entitled Benchmarking for Success.

The question is: Why was Bill Ayers keynoting a conference attended by the two highest officials in the Education Department and by Achieve, essentially the project manager of the nationalized education curriculum? It may be years before we know how often Ayers visited the White House, but the Ayers educational brand or philosophy is all over Common Core.

Some states are waking up. Virginia pulled out when Governor Bob McDonnell was elected. Georgia, Indiana, Utah, South Carolina, and others have begun the effort to extricate themselves.

When South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley said she would support a state legislative effort to block Common Core, which her predecessor had instituted, Education Secretary Arne Duncan dismissed her concerns about nationally imposed standards as "a conspiracy theory in search of a conspiracy."

education, and through four aims: local school councils, small schools, social justice teaching, and payment of reparations through education spending.

Local school councils and “small schools” are efforts to escape modern schools that, in Ayers’ estimation, “are all about sorting and punishing, grading and ranking and certifying” and demanding “obedience and conformity.”^[vi] Ayers’ numerous, supposedly scholarly, books and articles are filled with such hyperbole that depicts demands of the regular school day, like objective tests and class periods, as evidence of a police state.

Former Senior Policy Advisor to the Department of Education and member of the California Mathematics Framework Committee, Ze’ev Wurman, testified that the Common Core overlooks basic skills, lowers college readiness standards, and offers “verbose and imprecise guidance,”^[vii] while dictating that geometry be taught by an experimental method that was tested on Soviet math prodigies in the 1950s—and failed.

In English classes, teachers will reduce the amount of time spent teaching their subject of literature to only 50 percent, and then to 30 percent in high school, a move criticized by education reform professor Sandra Stotsky. Replacing literature will be “informational texts” like nonfiction books, computer manuals, IRS forms, and original documents, like court decisions and the Declaration of Independence. Documents, like the Declaration, however, are taught in a manner that downplays their significance. Overall, students will be losing a sense of a national and cultural heritage that is acquired through a systematic reading of classical literature and study of history.

Although the official rhetoric promoting these standards is more muted, the approach parallels Bill Ayers’ pedagogy. The replacement of traditional mathematics with “conceptual categories” lends itself to advancing a social justice agenda, as Ayers colleague Eric Gutstein does through his math education classes. The Common Core emphasis on having students simply explore original texts parallels the John Dewey-inspired approach that Ayers favors, of having students “discover” and “construct” knowledge. Not wanting to be beholden to outside, objective measurements of students’ knowledge, such teachers promote other more subjective measures, like displays of “deep” understanding, “higher-order” thinking, and ability to collaborate. By all indications, the testing being developed now will use such criteria.

THE ROLE OF BILL AYERS “PAL” LINDA DARLING-HAMMOND

Stanley Kurtz, in his latest book, Spreading the Wealth, maintains that a nationalized curriculum is part of an effort to replace local governments with regional boards, who would disburse local tax dollars equally among school districts. Once all schools are the same—with the same curriculum and the same funding—people will no longer have the incentive to move to good suburbs. While Obama's community organizing mentor, Mike Kruglik, implements the regionalism advocated by the Gamaliel Foundation through Building One America, Ayers' close associate, Linda Darling-Hammond, exercises "de facto control"^[viii] through education.

Both Ayers and Darling-Hammond were leaders in the small schools movement. She has published in a collection edited by Ayers. Both have been advocates of ending funding disparities between urban and suburban schools, ending standardized testing, and attacking "white privilege." She has been a board member of CASEL (Collaborative for Academic, Social, and Emotional Learning), a group housed at the University of Illinois at Chicago, that provides studies of, and services for, Emotional Intelligence in schools—but really emotional manipulation aimed at making students global citizens.

Both also failed to improve schools or test scores. Ayers' Annenberg Challenge failed miserably. The school created by Darling-Hammond, Stanford New Schools, which targeted low-income Hispanic and black students, had the distinction of making California's list of the lowest-achieving five percent. Much of the reason may be her "five-dimensional grading rubric" of personal responsibility, social responsibility, communication skills, application of knowledge, and critical and creative thinking. Yet, Darling-Hammond served as education director on Obama's transition team. In a January 2, 2009, Huffington Post column, Ayers argued for her nomination as Education Secretary. That summer, Darling-Hammond pushed Common Core in the Harvard Educational Review.

Darling-Hammond is in charge of content specifications at the Smarter Balanced Assessment Consortium (SBAC), which received $176 million of federal Race-to-the-Top money to develop Common Core testing. She appears frequently as a speaker and board member of other affiliated organizations. For example, she sits on the Governing Board of the Alliance for Excellent Education, Inc., recipient of a $500,000 Gates grant "to advocate for high school reform at the federal level in order to educate federal policy members about Common Core standards. . ."

In the August 2009 Harvard Educational Review, Darling-Hammond gave a preview of new standards as she argued for "deep understanding" and advancing beyond "the narrow views of the last eight years" by "developing creativity, critical thinking skills, and the capacity to innovate." New assessments would use "multiple measures of learning and performance." These would presumably emulate "high-achieving nations" that emphasize "essay questions and open-ended responses as well as research and scientific investigations, complex real-world problems, and extensive use of technology."

In an April 28, 2010, Education Week article, "Developing an Internationally Comparable Balanced Assessment System," Darling-Hammond claimed that the new assessment system is "designed to go beyond recall of facts and show students' abilities to evaluate evidence, problem solve and understand context." Bill Ayers, throughout his writings, likens the testing for "facts" to a factory or prison system, and agrees with Darling-Hammond's emphasis on criteria like "student growth along multiple dimensions." Such buzzwords thinly disguise an agenda of replacing the objective measurement of knowledge and skills with teachers' subjective appraisals of students' attitudes and behavior.

Former testing foes, like Columbia Teachers College professor Lucy Calkins, now advance Common Core standards. Although long an incubator of anti-testing advocates, Columbia has produced the authors of the popular Pathways to the Common Core (2012), one of them Calkins.

Pathways is maddening in its lack of specificity. Repeatedly, the authors inveigh against "skill-and-drill" and favor "deep reading" and "higher-level thinking;" but they fail to say how this will be done or even what it means. They discuss "read [ing] within the four corners of the text" and having readers get "their mental arms around a text,"^[ix] but offer no specific, much less tested, strategies for improving reading comprehension. They contradict themselves when they cite studies that show that students who read fiction improve reading levels and then promote nonfiction. When examples of informational texts are given, they are most often from left-leaning publications, often on trivial subjects.

Common Core thus promises to eliminate the idea of a common core of knowledge—through the privileging of leftist "informational texts" and material presented in a scattershot manner. The national and cultural identity that is conveyed through a wide and interconnected exposure to literary works from Mother Goose to Shakespeare will be undermined.

While proponents tout a close, critical reading of short texts, or excerpts, the truth is that the approach lends itself to infinite interpretations wildly off the mark. The approach—where uninformed groups of students speculate about "original documents"—is intended to make them radically skeptical of any historical legacy.

Original documents are presented in such a manner as to actually diminish them. For example, a sample exercise about Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address threw teachers into confusion when they were instructed to refrain from providing background and to read the speech without feeling. In this way, this pivotal document is stripped of its historical significance and eloquence. Nor are the religious references, so important to Lincoln's speeches, to be mentioned. The strategy puts the Gettysburg Address on the same plane as other "informational texts," say about frogs or snakes.

Other materials have the same effect. Stanford University's "Reading Like a Historian" Project, promoted in a July 30 Education Week article, offers teachers a ready-made lesson on the Cold War with four documents: excerpts from Churchill's Iron Curtain Speech, the Truman Doctrine Speech, a telegram sent by Soviet Ambassador Nikolai Novikov to the Soviet leadership in 1946, and a modified letter by Henry Wallace, shortly before he was asked to resign by President Truman. The "Guiding Questions" focus on "close reading" and "context." But with the scant information offered, students will likely see the final question, "Who was primarily responsible for the Cold War, the United States or the Soviet Union?" as one of moral equivalence.

Another lesson on the Cold War is sold by Rutgers professor Marc Aronson, who advertises himself as a "Common Core consultant," speaker, and author. He calls Common Core "a magnificent opportunity."^[x] His most recent book, Master of Deceit: J. Edgar Hoover and America in the Age of Lies, is tailored for English teachers who need to teach "informational texts" to middle and high school students. Aronson makes it easy for them, offering them free teachers guides.

Master of Deceit mocks Hoover's own bestselling Masters of Deceit that described and warned about communist subversion. Aronson's book is extremely manipulative and salacious, and engages in wild speculation. While a conservative point of view is thrown in here and there, the points come off as gratuitous and obviously contradictory to the main (correct) message. Aronson presents FBI Director Hoover as a repressed homosexual, who exploited Americans' irrational fears about communism. Among the "original documents" that Aronson provides are photographs—of Hoover with his friend Clyde Tolson. He points out, for the benefit of eleven-year-olds, that photos of Tolson reclining on a lawn chair, and fully clothed, "might be seen as lovers' portraits. . . but we cannot say for sure."

In fact, we can. As Bernie Reeves, founder of the Raleigh Spy Conference, has noted, the story of Hoover's alleged homosexuality was contrived by the KGB in the 1960s. He notes evidence that "...the Hoover rumor, fabricated by the KGB, found its way into the lexicon of our culture where it has evolved from vicious disinformation to accepted fact—a veritable success for the KGB and another example of the role of the failure of established media to serve as an honest broker in the affairs of the nation and the world."

"Hoover provided the security Americans wanted," writes Aronson. "Our beliefs about what was acceptable—what could be shown in public and what had to be guarded in private—shaped the secrets he could gather."

Aronson's parting words to the student are, "I hope Master of Deceit shows that we must always question both the heroes we favor and the enemies we hate. We must remain open-minded, even when the shadow of fear freezes our hearts." In fact, our fear was real. Hoover led the FBI's efforts to expose the Communist Party members and fronts that were part of the international communist movement that the editors of the Black Book of Communism had estimated were responsible for about 100 million dead.

Others advertise their services as Common Core speakers and workshop leaders, many through Edutopia, funded by movie producer George Lucas that has been promoting disturbing anti-bullying and emotional intelligence videos and workshops.

The publisher of Pathways to the Common Core, Heinemann, also publishes ready-to-go curricular material and offers workshops on Common Core by Calkins and her colleagues.

SELLING OBAMA CORE MATERIALS

Publishers are promoting new Core-aligned materials. The American Library Association directs educators to their Booklist, which offers "classics" suggestions from contemporary authors. More typical are categories like "Exploring Diversity."

TeachingBooks.net offers lesson plans and discussion questions, reportedly, to more than a quarter of all U.S. schools. The site also features interviews and blog posts by authors about the research process on favorite topics like the 1968 Memphis sanitation workers' strike.^[xi] Publishers Random House, Scholastic, and Holiday House are re-launching their teacher and librarian sites with information about the Core.^[xii]

PBS promotes the use of "public media" in the Common Core, thus updating their educational activities.

A July 18 Publishers Weekly article notes that publishers are eagerly putting out Common Core books by adapting adult nonfiction books, like Fast Food Nation, for classroom use in a new title, Chew on This. Indeed, they are following the lead of officials: One of the sample Common Core guides is for teaching The Omnivore's Dilemma.

Lerner Publishing Group is publishing biographies on stars, "such as Justin Bieber," while carefully adhering to "Core criteria such as reading level, narrative arc, and sentence structure." Books are sold in clusters, by topic, because "Typically, Core authors want students to think more critically about what they're reading . . . to compare multiple sources in different formats; and to give more sourced evidence, and less personal opinion in their writing."

Presumably, preteens would not be writing opinion essays about how "cute" Bieber is, but would rigorously be providing "sourced evidence" in their "deep" analyses.

CLASSROOM LESSONS

How is Common Core now being used in classrooms? On March 14, Education Week reported that tenth-graders in a suburb of Des Moines would be reading Nickel and Dimed by far-left activist Barbara Ehrenreich. This book, along with others on "computer geeks, fast food, teenage marketing, chocolate-making, and diamond-mining," is about the "real-world topics" (like Bieber) promoted by Common Core.

The Pearson Foundation, with a grant from the Gates Foundation, will offer a "coherent and systemic approach to teaching the Common Core State Standards." Another big, well-connected publisher, Scholastic, is developing "Everyday Literacy," which according to Education Week, is a "K-6 program that incorporates brochures, catalogs, menus, and other text types."

New York City's new "Core-Aligned Task" for eleventh- and twelfth-graders centers on "doing work 'On Behalf of Others.'" This idea of speaking out on behalf of the oppressed is canonized as "a long and dignified tradition of documentary work" that produces records "meant to raise questions and to function as calls to action."

Students are asked to "read" a New York Times photo essay and audio clip titled, "Joshua Febres: The Uncertain Gang Member." This exercise in "literacy" consists of "listen[ing] carefully" and "look[ing] closely at the images that accompany the audio."

The exercise, "Building reading comprehension," involves "extracting and analyzing relevant information from [Dorothea Lange's Depression-era] 'Migrant Mother' photos." The teacher is to:

Place students in pairs or trios. Using all the photographs, have the students spend at least ten minutes looking closely at the sequence of images that led up to the final image, as well as that final image. Ask them to infer what was selected and what was deflected from earlier photos, when making the final photo.

After reading an informational paragraph about James Agee and writing a one-sentence summary of it, students "return to [the] images." As a class they then read a web page "which describes the complicated history of that image."

The class next watches a short video about the artist "JR," who works "on behalf of others," by doing "massive public art installations all over the world in which he posts photographs of regular people on places such as the walls of buildings, rooftops, and the sides of bridges and trains."

The essay-writing task is a "micro-report" of 500 words "about an event you witnessed [sic] place or person you know that needs to be brought to light or told about."

Obviously, with only a "micro-report," evaluation cannot be based on written "literacy" alone. So the teacher is offered a handy "Speaking and Listening Standards: Observation and Comment Form." These upper-classmen are judged on "participat[ing] in collaborative discussion" that includes "work[ing] with peers to promote civil, democratic discussions and fair decision-making."

HIGHER STANDARDS?

Are these higher standards or dumbing down? Will Common Core produce well-educated Americans or indoctrinated pacifist global citizens?

Huffington Post blogger and "Award-Winning Historian and Inner City Teacher" John Thompson cheers this curriculum. So does PBS, as it promotes its educational materials as Common Core compliant, while receiving federal funds and the largesse of Bill Gates.

In her Harvard Educational Review article, "President Obama and Education: The Possibility for Dramatic Improvements in Teaching and Learning," published in the summer after Bill Ayers had urged her nomination as Secretary of Education, Linda Darling-Hammond waxed on about the Obama administration's "opportunity to transform our nation's schools." Some may remember Obama's promise to "fundamentally transform America." Darling-Hammond noted (or warned), "Barack Obama has outlined a set of ambitious plans to transform American education on a scale not seen since the days of the Great Society."

APPENDIX: THE GATES FOUNDATION

McGroarty and Robbins note that the Gates Foundation "has poured tens of millions of dollars into organizations that have an interest, financial or otherwise, in the implementation of Common Core."^[xiii] While the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation gives to worthy causes like fighting malaria and HIV infection, the foundation's 2010 IRS documents reveal funding of other, mostly leftist, causes. Gifts went to the Tides Fund, and Planned Parenthood and other "reproductive health" efforts. In education, Gates has given money to teachers unions, La Raza schools, and a school named after Caesar Chavez.

They have given a lot to school districts. After Bill Gates met with the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, reporter Jaime Sarrío gushed about Gates' generosity: a $20 million investment in "game-based learning," technical support in Georgia's Race to the Top application, a gift of $500,000 for teachers to meet the standards of Common Core, and $10 million for Atlanta public schools' "Effective Teacher in Every Classroom" program.

Florida schools received a substantial portion of education funding.

In 2010, the Gates Foundation gave millions to a number of developers of "game-based learning" and "digital learning." Gates is also helping companies that will evaluate teacher effectiveness, like Teachscape. Among Teachscape's business partners are the testing company ETS and the National Education Association. Teachscape's founder is on the board of Oracle, a company that advertises itself as teaching "21st century skills." Oracle donated money to Teachscape. Another business partner of Teachscape, Leaning Forward, will hold a conference in December, sponsored by the Gates Foundation. Presenters will offer their companies' and their schools' advice on using technology to implement Common Core. Session topics fall into categories like "Brain-Based Learning" and "Race, Class, Culture, and Learning Differences."

Gates also gave millions to projects on "data collection" programs that track teacher and student progress.

The Gates Foundation supported efforts to market Common Core through media "education." The Corporation for Public Broadcasting received half a million dollars to "identify and amplify 'teacher voice' to help ensure teachers are in the center of the dialogue on teacher accountability" (nothing for parent or citizen voice, though). NPR received $250,000 "to support coverage of education issues." The Education Writers Association received $603,900 "to enhance media coverage of high school and post-secondary education by offering seminars and online training for reporters building bridges between mainstream and ethnic community media," and $23,634 to "support media coverage of the education components of American Recovery and Reconstruction Act."

The Gates Foundation provided a $489,453 grant to the George Soros/Obama mouthpiece, the Center for American Progress, "to help communicate the importance of education reforms and support progressive states seeking to implement them." The same year CAP was also awarded $302,680 to "enhance degree completion for low-income young adults through the publishing of new policy papers, stakeholder engagement and media outreach." Over $1 million was given to the Editorial Projects in Education, which publishes Education Week, which is supported by other foundations favoring Common Core. Education Week published the Darling-Hammond article promoting new assessments. Stephen

errorist Professor Bill Ayers and Obama's Federal School Curriculum

Diamond in an October 9, 2008, blog post complained that Education Week was “whitewashing” Obama’s relationship with Bill Ayers in the Annenberg Challenge.

Universities across the country received grants to promote Common Core, as did Boards of Regents. Columbia Teachers College, Ayers’ alma mater, and place of employment for Lucy Calkins, was a major beneficiary.

Gates’ efforts are aligned with the federal government’s, of making reparations, as it were, by allocating money to low-income and minority students and making them “college-ready.” Such allocations are quite frequent in the tax return.

But critics worry that equalization will be achieved by lowering standards. None of the education non-profits funded by Gates are dedicated to raising standards through a rigorous, traditional curriculum, or by promoting Western or American principles. As Heather Crossin and Jane Robbins point out, realistically, the idea of universal college-readiness can be met only by lowering standards. Some Common Core advocates have admitted that this is the case.

[i] Stanley Kurtz, quoted in The Corruption Chronicles: Obama's Big Secrecy, Big Corruption, and Big Government by Tom Fitton (New York; Simon and Schuster, 2012) page 124.

[ii] Kurtz, Stanley. Spreading the Wealth: How Obama Is Robbing the Suburbs to Pay for the Cities. New York; Sentinel, 2012. 138.

[iii] The Judicial Watch Verdict, August 2012, Volume 18, Issue 8. 10, 12.

[iv] SMARTER Balanced Assessment Consortium and Partnership for Assessment Readiness of College and Careers

[v] David Coleman and Susan Pimentel, “Revised Publishers’ Criteria for the Common Core Standards.” Revised 4/12/12.

[vi] Ayers, William. “A Simple Justice: Thinking about Teaching and Learning, Equity, and the Fight for Small Schools,” in A Simple Justice: The Challenge of Small Schools, Ed. William Ayers, Michael Klonsky, and Gabrielle Lyon. New York: Teachers College Press, 2000. 1-8.

[vii] Page 25.

[viii] Kurtz. 184.

[ix] Page 39.

[x] Publishers Weekly, July 18, 2012.

[xi] Springen, Karen. “What Common Core Means for Publishers.” Publishers Weekly, July 18, 2012.