Background Materials and Research

Topic Summary: The Department of Public Health and Human Services created the Comprehensive School and Community Treatment (CSCT) program in 2005. No state statutes specifically authorize or govern the program. Instead, DPHHS created the program through administrative rules, under its broad statutory authority to administer the state Medicaid program and to provide services to children. The program allows schools to offer mental health treatment in the school setting, under the school's Medicaid provider number. Schools provide the matching funds for the services. Children generally must have a diagnosis of Serious Emotional Disturbance (SED) to receive services. However, some short-term interventional services are available to children with other behavioral health needs. Schools may offer the services themselves or contract for them. If they contract, administrative rules require that the contract be with a licensed mental health center.
