Background Materials and Research

Topic Summary:

Special education funding has received quite a bit of legislative attention in recent years, and especially following the 2015-2016 School Funding Interim Commission. That commission surveyed education stakeholders around the state for areas of concern related to school funding; special education funding was one of the four top priorities that the commission investigated over the interim, eventually recommending four bills to the 2017 Legislature. Only one of these, a resolution requesting an interim study was enacted.

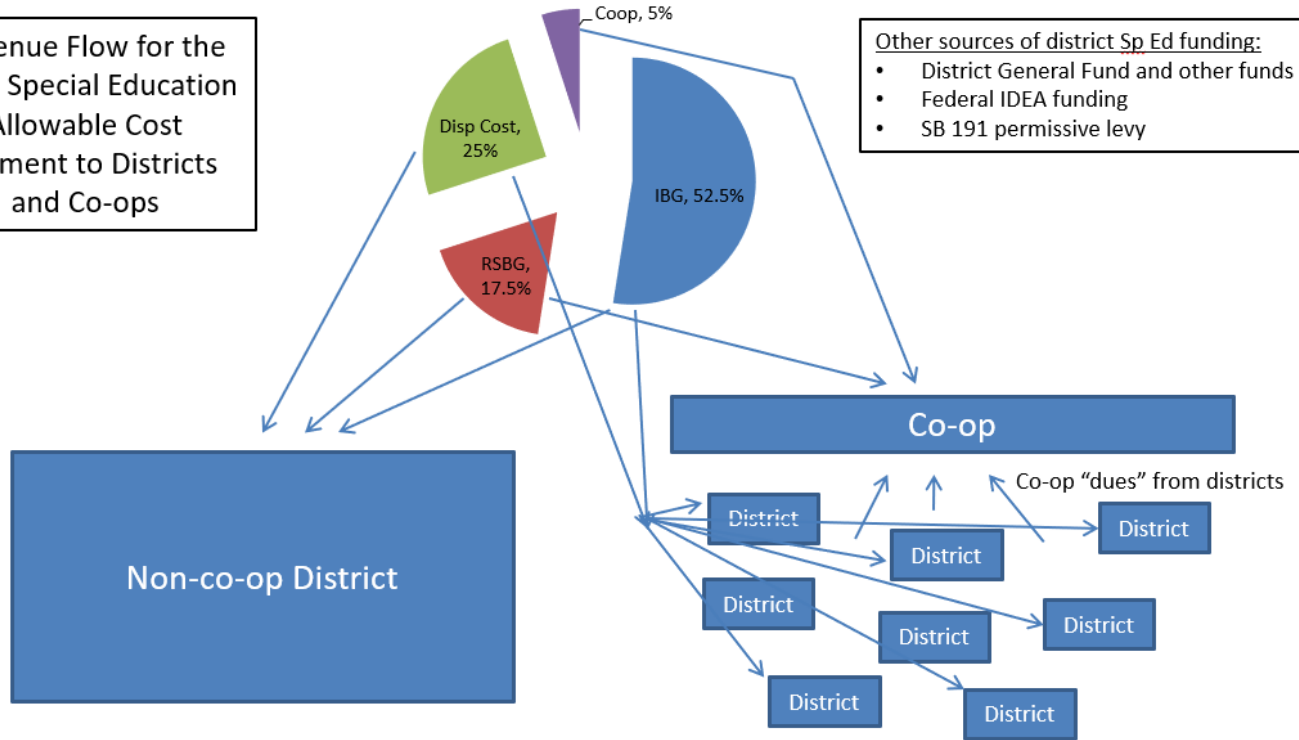

Montana's school funding formula is generally complicated, and the special education funding portion is no exception. The state special education allowable cost payment is distributed to school districts and special education cooperatives through four different allocations shown in the graphic on the following page. Special education is one component of districts' general fund budgets.

Montana's type of distribution is known as "capitation" as it is based largely on enrollment (ANB), but 25% of the total state appropriation is for reimbursements for districts that experience high costs. There are 21 special education cooperatives across the state that serve roughly one-third of Montana students. The vast majority of Montana school districts belong to a co-op, but our largest school districts generally do not. The cooperatives allow small, rural districts to pool their resources to ensure that their relatively small number of special education students have access to specialists such as speech-language pathologists, occupational therapists, school psychologists, etc.

One concern that has been raised for a number of years is that the special education payment is the one component of district general fund budgets that does not receive a statutory inflationary increase.
